Tina Lund Interview

In conversation with Tina Lund from the Nordic Resistance Movement the German Social Nationalist organisation Der Dritte Weg recently conducted an interview with Tina Lund from the Nordic Resistance Movement.

The conversation covered topics such as her history of activism and women's wider role in the struggle.

In Defiance of ZOG: Keeping National Socialism Online

by Maurice Conchos

The alarm went off for Bob Smith at 1 A.M., and he groaned softly as he woke up for another day of work. It amused him to hear people complain about the nine-to-five grind. “Try three-to-noon with no breaks whatsoever,” he would think. Usually he was wrapping up his work day and finishing paperwork as others were shaking off their morning train ride. Usually, he just kept his thoughts to himself. Oh, well. It paid the bills, even if private school for the kids strained his budget severely.

Occasionally there would be a special project to execute and he might work as long as fourteen or sixteen hours, and they usually didn’t give him the benefit of advance notice. Phones and external communication were not permitted in his line of work, so even though most days he was home by the early afternoon, his wife had ultimately given up on guessing when he would be home.

After a quick shower, Bob filled his mug with coffee and headed out the door with a sack lunch since usually picking up lunch (at breakfast-time) was out of the question. At least traffic in northern Virginia was quiet as he drove to the secured building where he would spend the next eight or more hours.

Attempts to hack or shut down websites has happened since the beginning, of course, but the censorship wave that commenced after the election of Donald Trump in 2016 has changed in character. Shutting down websites has moved from the primary occupation of individual or loose networks with grudges or points to prove (such as Anonymous or other hacker groups) to being a matter of interest to governments and major institutions.

The Daily Stormer was the largest and most broadly reported, but the force of DDoS (Distributed Denial of Service) attacks was brought to bear against a number of popular websites. Those included The Right Stuff, Vanguard America, Infostormer, and uncounted (and uncountable) social media accounts, Paypal accounts, Coinbase accounts, and Discord rooms. Anyone who shared a message contrary to neoliberalism—no matter how mildly critical—was suddenly liable to get removed, shut down, or banned.

In this series we will focus on independent websites, how they are shut down, and how they are kept online. Specifically, we will highlight the successes of Zensurfrei.

The concept of the Denial of Service (DoS) attack is simple. Imagine sending a request to a computer—for example, a simple account login—for which you do not have credentials and know that you know will be denied. It would be like making a phone call to a business and talking to the secretary (or anybody else) as if you had a legitimate need. After one minute you would hang up, and for that minute that secretary was unavailable to attend to other callers with actual business to conduct.

Your authentication request, like the phone call, won’t amount to much. Your single login attempt would consume far less of a typical server’s resources than a wasteful phone call to a human being. However, you have consumed something. When you made that login request the server reacted by checking your request against a database table of usernames and passwords—the passwords being in encrypted

Janina M. Lauck: A National Socialist Wife

At 05:45 on February 9, 2020, a Sunday morning, I received a not unexpected phone call from the hospice. My wife Janina had passed away. Just a minute ago.

Most people know little about her.

I had always intentionally tried to keep her out of the limelight.

Keep her safe.

Janina was born in Chicago on May 5, 1950. Her parents had fled Lithuania at the end of the war to escape the communists.

They spoke Lithuanian in the home. Although born in America Janina did not learn English until she went to kindergarten.

I first met Janina at the corner of 72nd and Fairfield. I was returning from Germany, where I had been a defense witness at the famous Bückeburg trial after receiving temporary immunity from arrest.

This beautiful former Lithuanian television model was also a good cook. And pro-NS!

We quickly fell madly in love, became engaged, and got married the following year. (She had already turned down marriage proposals from two millionaires.)

For ten years we lived in Marquette Park and I became a marketing executive. (Excellent co-workers back in Lincoln enabled me to continue political work despite distance and employment.)

Janina lived most of her life in the Lithuanian community in Marquette Park on Chicago's southwest side. This neighborhood fiercely resisted the Black invasion.

Marquette Park was also a National Socialist stronghold!

The powerful Chicago Mayor Daley Senior once publicly vowed to close down the "Nazi headquarters." But then his own precinct captains told him this would cost him too many votes. So he backed down!

I personally participated in a White Power rally in Marquette Park with 5,000 people by police estimate. The vast majority were pro-party. Hundreds wore White Power t-shirts with a huge swastika. (The reporters present were terrified. When the crowd started to turn against the reporters a comrade stepped in to save them.)

Despite heroic resistance the neighborhood eventually fell to the invaders.

Tina Lund Interview

The original aim of this article was to give an insight into the structure of the Nordic Resistance Movement, with emphasis on the work of its women. After a detailed interview with Tina, and some private words afterwards, it was only right that the article also served to give a personal insight into the life of a woman who in all respects has devoted herself to the struggle for folk and nation in an inspirational way. She offers direct, thought-provoking words, anecdotes from the field that inspire courage, and truths requiring no discussion.

I realised that Tina was a special woman over a year ago when I met her at a Nordic Resistance Movement demonstration in Stockholm. She has an open, warm manner and had much to relate about political difficulties, social change and the slow but certain re-education of her people that has taken place in recent decades.

Tina's way of thinking has always been very traditional, or natural, as she calls it. For her, National Socialism is the most natural way of life – preservation of the blood and preservation of the Nordic culture are fundamental. As is often the case, this led to an interest in seeking and maintaining contact with those who share her ideals.

Her activism was sparked by the first wave of migration from the Balkans in the early 1990s. In the 1994 election she became politically active in the Sweden Democrats, who at that time still had nationalist values and goals, but during the succeeding years would be increasingly transformed into a system-controlled, liberal cesspit.

The struggle for her country drove her further, and in 1998 she joined the National Socialist Front as a political activist and earned respect and recognition among her mostly male party comrades.

When her children were born, things were quieter for a few years for the energetic Tina. She dedicated herself to her role as a mother and embraced the most beautiful time in a woman's life. But as the political changes in Sweden showed no signs of abating, she decided it was time for a new challenge: a return to the front for the national resistance while uniting family and activism. Because the fight for the fatherland is not a gender issue, as the Swedes say, but a responsibility that every one of us has.

Thus this extraordinary woman found her place in the Nordic Resistance Movement around five years ago. I asked if her children are marginalised at school:

“No, not at all,” said Tina. “Many of the children think it's cool their classmates' mum is in the Resistance Movement.”

She doesn't have any problems with the other parents either. In the small Swedish town where she lives, she is accepted.

Today Tina leads her own group within the Nordic Resistance Movement and has the respect from her comrades that she earned via her many years of activism. She is especially proud of the women in the organisation, who don't just support the men but are also active in the everyday work of the movement. Public leafleting, putting up placards or being on the catering team at events – everyone contributes according to their abilities.

Those who cannot be active publicly can contribute in other ways, with one example being the Swedish-language podcast made for and by women – Radio Regeringen.

The question of role assignment within the Nordic Resistance Movement can quickly be explained in one sentence: The right person in the right place. Everyone has their duties, according to their strengths and interests, regardless of whether they are male or female. Tina says there is only exception: “On demonstrations, the men hold the shields. We want to convey traditional ideals because we stand for traditional values.”

Tina also sees her leadership as a possibility. By being a role model for other women, she gives them the courage to stand up against the modern Zeitgeist – encapsulated in the motto “What I can do, you can do too.” That's why she appears on the organisation's radio shows, talks to Swedes on the streets during public activities and tries to understand why so few women are interested in political activism.

Being a mother herself, she asks herself the same question again and again:

Tina Lund Interview

How can someone just descend into passivity and comfort and leave a worse world to their children? We are the last generation who can change something. After us, it's up to our children, and it will be more difficult for them than us. Activism on the streets is just a small part of our work. We have members who prefer to work behind the scenes for personal reasons, but they still contribute to an essential part of the whole. There is no reason not to be active!

Tina rightly accuses those women who wander around blindly, entrenched in the morbid Bolshevik Zeitgeist, while spending their time marketing their “individual” personalities on Instagram, Facebook etc.

But in Sweden there are a few (both men and women) who take matters into their own hands and do not shy away from standing out from the masses. They come from all walks of life and have found their way to the organisation in their own ways, whether they are women who have been harassed by “new Swedes”, youths who are sick of unhealthy additives and ruthless factory farming and have found the path to a more natural lifestyle via an article by the Resistance Movement, or the man who wants to drop off his wife and children in the evening with a clear conscience.

Tina knows that her movement makes a difference and she is proud of being a part of the whole – fighting as a white woman and mother, for Sweden, her fatherland and all of the North. In closing, I would like to thank Tina for her time, from woman to woman. She is more than just a Weggefährtin. Women like her deserve to be called pioneers.

form. This was not “free” and consumed a tiny amount of internet bandwidth, some CPU cycles, a single server process dedicated to database connections, and some electrical energy.

If you were of a particularly vengeful personality and had enough time at your disposal, you might call that business over and over to waste as much time as possible. Or you could repeatedly sit at your keyboard typing random passwords into the login screen. Now you are engaging in a DoS attack to disrupt that server or small business. And finally, to take it up a notch you could run a script to rapidly and repeatedly send server requests or robocall that business.

At this point, legitimate requests to a server will no longer go through, and people may get an error indicating that too many database connections are being attempted or the site will simply “hang up,” unable to respond to your request. Callers to the business will only get a busy signal or be directed to voicemail.

However, at this point the object of your rage will very likely notice that it is the target of an attack and take defensive measures. To get by, the server administrator could configure the server to stop trying to respond to incoming requests from your location. The business could have the phone company block your phone number.

Thus, the DoS attack is not a particularly dangerous or powerful attack on anyone. It may have worked under a high-trust network model, which was more common decades ago. It could also work for a short time against a trustful or unprepared opponent, but to a competent victim it will be little more than a minor annoyance. The next step in attack sophistication is the distributed denial-of-service, or DDoS attack.

Bob Smith arrived at work at 2:30 A.M. and scanned his badge at the door of an undistinguished building with a vague name designed not to attract notice or attention. Security cameras read his facial features to verify that he was indeed the individual associated with his identification. A green light and a beep indicated that the door was unlocked.

In Defiance of ZOG

The hastily assembled team was internally called the “Youth Protection Task Force.” Its charter indicated that it was created to protect children from online predators, which Bob felt to be a worthy cause. However, the work had not been exactly what he expected. He had imagined that they would be tracking sexual predators and pedophiles. Instead, the current assignment involved shutting down a website that was advocating National Socialism.

Well, that was okay by Bob as well since the National Socialist German Workers’ Party of Germany in the 20th century had put six million innocent Jews in gas chambers and then killed them with Zyklon B. So in a sense people who promoted National Socialism online were kind of like pedophiles, except that they were poisoning the minds of children rather than the bodies of Jews.

In training they had pointed out how hate speech leads to violence by encouraging and justification escalating levels of hatred that are eventually “acted out” against the dehumanized “enemy.” Therefore, shutting down hateful speech can prevent real-world violence by stopping hate in its tracks and quarantining infected individuals to prevent it from spreading. A team of network security professionals had been assembled to attack the most dangerous forms of this plague, beginning with explicitly National Socialist websites. (Proto-fascists such as Patriot, libertarian, and conservative Christian groups would be targeted as well.)

Bob and his team sat down at their desks, coffee in hand, and executed scripts to check through the accumulated resources of the network, which included servers under their control in various parts of the world. The script “pinged” them to check their status, tally their available resources, confirm their responsiveness to commands, and test their pre-set attack patterns on test machines.

If all went well, today’s target would be overwhelmed by the force of such a large attack network and hate propaganda would stop flowing to children and adolescents.

DDoS attacks are the next step in attack sophistication above the simple DoS or denial-of-service. Rather than originate an attack from a single source, the attacker marshals resources from many locations, each to play their own part by attempting their own DoS on the target—at the same time.

On a small business, this would be like having 1,000 people all repeatedly calling in from different locations. One could not simply block a telephone number because there would be 999 other calls coming in. Those on the receiving end could not keep up with all the phone calls, even if each robocall coming in were immediately blocked. The time it would take to block all callers would consume the poor secretary for days or weeks.

Similarly, a typical server can not keep up with 1,000 simultaneous connection requests. Denying request after request involves processing incoming requests, checking the database and sending out refusals. The only way a single server could possibly stay functional under the circumstances would be to correctly identify who was legitimately connecting and who was attacking. And rather than process and send out error messages, the aggressive sources would have to be dropped without response.

There will be legitimate requests mixed in with aggressive requests. Therefore, the defender must minimize two kinds of errors: “false positives” wherein a legitimate user is dropped—unable to access the server’s information—and “false negatives” where an attacker is granted the privilege of a response. (Under the circumstances, responding with a rejection is “expensive.”) Sometimes an attacker may not be identified on the first response, but a pattern is only obvious after a number of connections. The server must therefore check connections against patterns of aggressive behavior, some-

A National Socialist Wife

Janina and I had to leave.
She was heart-broken. And never fully recovered.

I know this may seem hard to believe, but
it's nonetheless true:

It was not always easy to be the wife of a well-known National Socialist activist!

The ups and downs in life tend to be a bit more extreme.

Janina suffered.

A lot.

But she endured.

Janina's physical body is now ash.

But Janina herself lives on.

In my heart.

In the hearts of all of us who love and cherish her memory.

times after a number of attempts. A “good”
defense will therefore identify these patterns quickly—after only a small number of attempts—rather than respond only to an extended pattern of attack.

* * * * *

There are other attack patterns besides DDoS.
With a successful defense a determined attacker—as governments and institutions tend to be—will attempt other approaches. For example, websites that prove resilient against DDoS may find themselves taken down by forces pressuring hosting services to implement and enforce “terms and conditions” that grow both in scope and opacity. The infrastructure that maintains the network, called Domain Name Servers (DNS), suddenly becomes inaccessible to those who irk the Establishment.

Most websites were unprepared for the onslaught and fell to the basis DDoS strategy.
Shutting down explicitly National Socialist sites quickly became (mostly) old hat. Sites associated with the “Alt-Right” movement were also attacked after the initial shock and in the panicked early days of the Trump administration. Then “Alt-Lite” sites. Then “Patriot” sites. Claiming not to be “racist” did not matter. As the Alt-Right sites were lost, the Alt-Lite and Patriot sites had taken it as proof that their claims of being “not racist,” were not cowardly but rather smart.

It was an interesting proof and a perennial case study in the truth of fascism. Individual “sticks” were easily broken and the string that could have held the “bundle” together quickly unraveled. These early take-downs demonstrated the vulnerability of the unprepared and those who had not anticipated, sought, cultivated, or retained the requisite talents.

Now that the basic technology of a DDoS has been described a sequel may follow Bob and his team through a coordinated and sophisticated DdoS attack on Zensurfrei. Spoiler: It will fail.
